The late Ola Proudfoot leaves the library as her living legacy

Nearly 30 years ago, Huntingdon's Ola Proudfoot had a dream, which she shared with some of her friends: to open a community library in Huntingdon. This small group put their heads together and made this dream come true.

In 1972, the Little Green Library opened its doors to serve the community of Huntingdon and the surrounding area. Its location, then and now, is at 6 Hunter St.

Over the years, Ola cherished her dream-come-true, and worked hard to support it. Not one week went by that she didn't make several visits to the library, and she understood its workings right down to the tiniest details. She kept an eye on everything, passing many days classifying books, checking on things, or cleaning up. Up until just recently, she attended every meeting and got involved in every possible way she could right up to the end.

We will never forget her nearly 30 years of devoted service to the Library, as well as her devotion and involvement on nearly every one of its committees. She gave freely of her time and herself made frequent donations to the coffers.

Ola, we will always remember you.
